WHAT YOU HAVE TO KNOW ABOUT CEUTA

The population of Ceuta and the administration, are very sensitive to the public image of the city. It is a bordering city and it is quite small, besides it has got an exceptional and specific political situation, due to its border management and migratory issues.

There is huge presence of soldiers, police officers and civil servants in and around the city, not only at the border or the nearby areas. In 2015, the Law of Citizen Security in Spain was approved, known by those organizations which work for human rights as "Ley Mordaza". Some of the key points to consider:

Police officer could force any citizen to identify themselves without any reason. The authorities have the right to do that and the rejection could lead into an economic fine.

It's forbidden filming or taking photos to any security force body based on their own security, under economical fine. There are many cases of organizations that despite having the authorization to film, have been fined even at an individual level.

Unauthorized gatherings of more 20 people and the obstruction of public roads-streets are also subject to sanctions or fines.

Some of the international organizations that work in the city which legal status is recognized as autonomous, work based on the principle of "neutrality". Organizations, activists and volunteers who work with migrants are very well known and committed.

APDHA is well known in the autonomous city and works frequently in the field, researching and reporting the migrants situation and issues as well as "porteadoras". Our relationship with other organizations and activists is very good. However, relations with the Ceutian administration is not exempt from obstacles and sometimes impediments

Tarajal march: Tarajal is a beach located in Ceuta (Spain), at the border with Morocco. Immigrants try often to go from one side to another through the sea.

The 6 of February 2014, people were trying to cross by swimming in the sea and 15 are known to be dead after the action of the Spanish police. Some have disappeared, and others have been pushed back in Morocco. Every year a march take place in Ceuta.

GOOD TO KNOW
